

INTRODUCTION TO THE SERIES

Around 2003, when the world was obsessed with sex, and still is, certain writers and ordinary people were invited to share their experiences of sexual and other embarrassing events which troubled them and, as a result, these matters have been produced in this series of dilemmas.

A dilemma is a situation that requires a choice ; it is a problem that may defy a satisfactory conclusion; it is something that presents two alternatives which may have the same consequence ; it can be a state of uncertainty and perplexity ; it can be a very troublesome matter.

Some will find some of these incidents trivial and, perhaps, ridiculous, but they were not trivial to the writers and they may have moral lessons for many.

There are many people who are frightened by some aspects of sex and there are men who are very wary of being accused of any impropriety or voyeurism, even mild voyeurism. Women can be very accusative and some can be villainous as in the article Sperm Bandits.

Men can also be guilty, and many are, of despicable acts against women.

One of the real problems is that men are being accused of sexual offences when they are not guilty. There are some decent women who come to the defence of men who are falsely accused and these honourable women lament how the courts seem to favour the women in many cases and unfairly.

It is hoped that these articles will stimulate talking points and be salutatory and beneficial where necessary.
